(It's not even a place to plan a drunken night out). Not only is it peppered with beautiful and dangerous reefs, but it has a lot of jellyfish. We visited this island not because we expected the Bahamas to be awesome, but because we thought they had a good reputation as a party place. The Grand Cayman Islands are another Caribbean destination that is a party destination, but when you see all the pictures of white sand beaches lined with cheap, shifty hotels and the hordes of tourists who descend on them, it's not really worth going for the holiday. The Bahamas, on the other hand, are known for their boat parties, and had a good reputation. However, when we got there, we found that the old clichés were true: drunken tourists, sea urchins, and jellyfish. After visiting Nassau airport, we rented a car and headed south from this city in the middle of the largest island. The car we rented was so large that we needed to get extra seats for our 6 suitcases. It's not worth taking the car around the island; the island is on a peninsula, so it is wide and all roads are connected by bridges. We only explored the southern part of the island, but there was still plenty of excitement: we drove through a mall, saw a mini-golf course, and one of the few LPG gas stations in the world. The main reason we went here was the beach clubs and the all-night parties, but not only did we get robbed and nearly get run over by a taxi and a horse-drawn carriage, but we also got jellyfish stung. So, we're glad we didn't make it our primary destination. The first beach was Sandy Cay, the cheapest party on the island. We had to drive a long way to find the beach and when we got there, we were shocked at how it was not much more than a cliff that people threw chairs and blankets on to watch the party. Only after walking along the beach and walking up to an area where black 82138339de
